

Almost There... (Continued)

Friends are what get you through here, nothing else. Think about it, you are going to get in here, not on your own, but with the help of lots of others. You need others in order to do anything, really. I have learned that this last semester and personally don't like the idea. I prefer being on my own most the time, and don't like having to rely on others, but it is the best way to get things done. It makes your life 3 bazillion times better.

And it does in fact snow here. Snow is amazing. Some people hate it, but I'm from California and never lived in snow. I love it. Oh and when you can decorate your room for holidays, get wrapping paper and cover your floor, then you don't need to buff your deck.

If you plan on making a long distance relationship last, I wish you luck, mine didn't last, but I have a new one with a classmate. So, I'm not saying it's impossible, but very unlikely it will last. I denied it myself and well, yeah, didn't last. You never know what will happen with relationships; emotions aren't logical nor are they convenient. Most important thing for every relationship is clear communication and understanding. Understanding can be very difficult when you change so much as you live a new life in this military institution and it is even more difficult to understand if your boyfriend or girlfriend is not military.

So good luck to you, whatever happens, whether I get to see you here next year, the year after, if you get into another service academy, or you go to another college. If you have options, don't pick for the benefits only, but choose based on your desire to be there and do your best.
